About Plainview Gardens

Gayle Hoagland sparked her passion for growing food when she started a community garden off of Plainview Road on the way to Sisters. Previously in the financial industry, she retired and pursued a life of being outdoors and sharing good food with people. Through the community garden project she learned about season extenders and now operates her own greenhouses where she focuses not only on vegetable production but also on organic plant starts that people can use to grow their own healthy gardens.

"I love watching a plant grow from a tiny seed."

Why farm and preserve?

"I love the growing part and it's fulfilling if good food is a passion of yours. My mom preserved everything and I hadn't done it in a while so I took an acidified foods preservation course with OSU Extension."

Why grown plant starts?

"It's hard to find organic plant starts in Central Oregon. My plants are acclimated to the area which make them stronger. I want to help foster people to be self sufficient."
